In addition to being educators, scientists and physicians, Baylor College of Medicine faculty play an important role in providing critical information to the public. They share their expertise broadly, whether through news media interviews, testifying before government committees or meeting with public officials and health organizations. One day you may hear them addressing the likelihood of a flu pandemic or Zika outbreak; another, the best ways to train for a marathon or pack a healthy lunch.

They also help set policy, from providing recommendations on cancer screening tests to ensuring access to care. Being available to the community with essential health information is just one way each faculty member proudly serves our city—and our world.

Look in the Medical and Science section every Monday and visit bcm.edu to see how Baylor is achieving the amazing in our community.
