Since 1971, the Baylor College of Medicine Teen Health Clinic program has provided access to top-level healthcare resources for young people in the neighborhoods that need us most. Today these 10 community and school-based centers provide comprehensive medical care along with support groups and education in life skills to help these young men and women make the right decisions and provide them with a medical home.

Baylor College of Medicine has long been committed to creating innovative programs, like the Teen Health Clinics, that meet the needs of young people and help them achieve amazing things as they mature into adulthood.

Look in the Medical and Science section every Monday and visit bcm.edu to see how Baylor is achieving the amazing in our community.
